Jupit

WASHINGTON, Sept. 27: Jupiter was seen at its closest approach to Earth in 59 years on Monday. Stargazers were treated to an excellent view of the giant gas planet in "opposition". The next time Jupiter will come this close will be in 2129.

From the view from Earth's surface, the planet happens when an astronomical object rises in the sky as the Sun sets in the west, placing the object in the Sun on opposite sides of Earth.

"Stargazers: Jupiter will make its closest approach to Earth in 59 years on Monday, permitting, expect to see excellent views on September 27. A good pair of eyes should be enough to see some details; you may need a large telescope to see the Great Red Spot," tweeted.

Jupiter's opposition occurs every 13 months.
